

ECW2841 : Developing New Worlds: Environment and Historical Research

In the Developing New Worlds: Environment and Historical Research course, students will conduct research specifically tailored for building the worlds in which their stories take place. In addition to researching environments, students will explore cultures and the sets of tools through which cultures communicate, maps, and histories. Students will also hone their critical-thinking skills as they apply their findings to create the time period and environment within their writing, be it the past, present, or future, and whether it is historically accurate or anachronistic.
